

Chief Information Security Officer for Hire

Filling your unique needs for a security and privacy executive

Companies need guidance in securing client data

Companies continue to struggle to comply with regulatory laws such as HIPAA, PCI, Sarbanes-Oxley, GLBA and other global privacy and security laws. Many companies, like yours, have needs not only in maintaining the confidentiality of client data but also in providing assurances to clients that the security controls you have implemented conform to existing laws and regulations. Many companies do not have a Chief Information Security Officer (CISO) on their staff, or they may be in a transition phase while seeking a qualified CISO.

In the meantime, your company may struggle to address various aspects in the area of information security and privacy. Your organization not only has immediate needs related to regulatory compliance, but also must address some of the latest technology and security issues such as cloud computing, and securing smart devices such as iPads and iPhones.

Your company may ultimately decide that having access to industry experts in the area of security and privacy without having to hire a full time CISO may be the right answer for your needs.

- Able to fill a role in your organization for a few months or can continue to provide security support for several years
- Deep experience in management of technical security and/or privacy staff
- Extensive knowledge to help you define your security and privacy policies and standards, develop awareness and training programs and move your current projects to successful completion
- Vision to assist in structuring your organization to support your security and privacy needs
- Practical experience to help you define your optimal security organization and identify the right candidate to lead the security organization in the future
- Available on-site for the duration of the engagement or they can work remotely to provide executive support

VCISO Case Study

A large, mid-western law firm was looking for guidance in responding to client inquiries concerning protection of data as it related to HIPAA and Massachusetts privacy and security laws. They had a strong IS staff but no one dedicated to information security and privacy issues. They reached out to Securely Yours for assistance.

Securely Yours was able to step in and provide an executive level VCISO to aid the law firm in appropriately responding to client inquiries.

Securely Yours participated in vendor audits and provided guidance to both the law firm and their clients to avoid any misunderstandings related to the application of security and privacy laws. Securely Yours also assisted with the development of security awareness and training materials for the law firm to ensure that employees understand the security requirements as well as their individual role in protecting confidential client information.

Securely Yours continues to function as the information security thought leader for this firm, providing guidance in state-of-the-art security and privacy issues such as mobile security and cloud computing.
